the caves are like trenches in World War I, with each side of the multifront battle making infrequent attacks and then retreating into its bunker. Perhaps the caves aren't as close together as shown on the map, and the canyon is more like a hundred miles long, so that the different tribes don't come into contact with one another as often.

Rainwater mixed with carbon dioxide, forming a weak carbonic acid. This acid solution slowly ate away at the limestone, leaving behind small pockets that filled with water. As more limestone dissolved over many thousands of years, pockets grew into passageways. Passageways grew into rooms, rooms grew into caverns, and the caves were slowly formed.
